Children are disappearing from the outdoors at a rate that would make them top of the conservationist's list of endangered species if they were other member of the animal kingdom

- Tim Gill

A child's experience in the natural world can be as small as touching a plant, sitting under, on or around a tree, or listening to the voices of birds. Spending time in a natural environment and to be documented to improve. life and learning in many ways.

Sadly, such a connection with nature has been slipping away from many of us and especially so for the world's children.

We at Outlife, Reconnect Children to the nature with real experiences.

Reconnecting children with the natural world have few of the following benefits:

- #Contributes to the physical, mental, emotional and intellectual development of the child.
- #Outdoors provide diverse opportunities to engage children's curiosity, cognition and creativite.
- #Promotes learning and zest for life.
- #Adventure helps children to conquer their fears and build strength, confidence and resilience.
- #Enhances problem solving abilities, imbibes self discipline and inner tenacity.
- #Children nurture themselves and are empathetic towards others.
- #Enables the child to explore oneself, bond with nature and create life lasting impressions.

Children learn practical outdoor & life skills, which make them confident, creative and self-reliant individuals.
